Finally, a Film That Celebrates Public Education

WASHINGTON POST, July 21, 2013

“Go Public” celebrates the small and large miracles that happen in Pasadena classrooms every day. We see overcrowded classrooms, but we also see an elementary teacher who greets each student with a special word of support as he or she arrives in her classroom. As you watch the students, teachers, parents, and others in the film, you will no doubt think about your own experiences with and stereotypes about public schools. Whether or not you or your children went (or go) to public school, we all have a stake in the quality of our public schools.

Review of “GO PUBLIC”

VIDEO LIBRARIAN, March-April 2014

[GO PUBLIC] serves as an effective rebuttal to critics of American public education. Instead of depicting a troubled system characterized by uncaring teachers and unresponsive students, the film emphasizes the skill and dedication of the staff and the learning efforts of their young charges. Recommended.

My “Academy Awards” for Best Educational Documentaries

EDUTOPIA, February 25, 2014

Given the 50 different directors working in 50 different settings, this could have been a mess, but the combination of great footage and exceptional editing creates a powerful film.

Review: Go See “GO PUBLIC”

CTA MAGAZINE, December 30, 2013

GO PUBLIC is an amazingly ambitious, layered, moving and inspirational film. It’s a call to action for stakeholders everywhere to support public schools — because they help children succeed, for the most part, despite dwindling resources. GO PUBLIC shows us what make public schools tick — the people — and reminds us that despite challenges, there’s also a great deal to celebrate and treasure in our schools.

“Go Public”: A Film That Champions Public Education

NEA TODAY, November 15, 2013

“When you see what’s really going on at the schools, it will impress and excite you, and make you want to be a part of it,” says special ed teacher Kathleen Bautista, also in the film. “This film shows you the reason we need to financially support and champion our local public schools.”
